

Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to force their stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election is a clear example of the dangers of media consolidation. This type of behavior while typical is nonetheless unconscionable, and as such should be well within the scope of the FCC to regulate.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge, and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. But when large companies control the airwaves, we get more of what's good for the bottom line and less of what we need for our democracy. Instead of something produced at "News Central" far away, it's more important that we see real people from our own communities and more substantive news about issues that matter.

Sinclair's actions show quite clearly why we need to strengthen media ownership rules, not weaken them. They also show why the license renewal process needs to involve more than rubber stamp and a returned postcard. Thank you.
